(15) Because she had covered her face.--The Jewish commentators all agree that this was not the custom of harlots; and as Judah, in Genesis 38:21, calls her kedeshah, one consecrated, he probably thought that she was a woman performing the vow required of every female votary of the Ph?nician Venus (Astarte), once in her lifetime (Herod. i. 199). Hence the hire was a kid to be sacrificed to the g

When she "plays" the harlot, Tamar, garbed in a veil and with her face covered, is the sign of a "body available" but remains invisible and unknowable, and neither Judah, nor his man recognizes her. Finally, when being declared by Judah "holy," Tamar becomes again knowable and visible but at that point her body is transformed into a "revered body," which is, by definition, also a forbidden body.

Restoring the SELF and the Harlot by the Side of the Road ...

Kirsch pens in a description of Tamar's veil falling off, then speculates about how Judah's fervor might have been affected by the discovery that the harlot by the side of the road was his neglected daughter-in-law. While such fictionalizations surely eroticize the original texts, they purposefully cleanse them of any supernatural qualities.
