Was Hitler a Darwinian? Disputed Questions in the History of Evolutionary Theory, by Robert J. Richards. Nazi ideology may not have adopted evolutionary theory wholesale, but it certainly used its ideas, says Yvonne Sherratt. Across nine scholarly and wide-ranging essays, centred on the influence and impact of Charles Darwin and Darwinism on Western thought, Robert Richards begins with an assessment of the moral implications of the theory, and goes on to consider its relationship with ...

Several scholars and a host of religious conservatives have argued that Hitler derived his anti-Semitic racism from Darwin's theory. They suggest this connection morally taints Darwinians and undermines evolutionary conceptions. Careful examination shows that Hitler's racial views had no connection with Darwinian ideas; indeed, he held to the fixity of species and thought descent of human beings from animal forbearers absurd.

Was Hitler a Darwinian? - Chicago Scholarship

Richards argues that Hitler's racial theory came from "one source in particular," i.e., H. S. Chamberlain, and since Chamberlain rejected Darwinian evolution, then Hitler's views were not Darwinian, either. 7. Richards states that I ignore many factors that gave rise to Nazism.

The last chapter demolishes the putative links between Darwin and Hitler. First, Darwin was no anti-Semite unlike Hitler, of course, whose anti-Semitism was derived from elsewhere and the centrepiece of his world view. Moreover, Hitler rejected Darwin's contention that humans and apes descended from a common ancestor.
